[63] Thought was normal in form, stream and possession. Prevailing themes were of injustice at his conditions of incarceration, and discussion of his morality and philosophies on life. There was no delusional content expressed. He denied suicidality but noted deliberate self-harm often from ingesting objects as a form of protest. He denied perceptual abnormalities but reported receiving messages, not in the form of hallucinated speech and with a laudatory flavour. Cognitively he appeared to be of average intellect. In terms of insight, Mr Binse did not feel that he suffered significant mental illness, except post-traumatic stress disorder which he attributed to his lengthy incarceration in austere and harsh conditions.

[69] Although he might meet the diagnostic criteria for post-traumatic stress disorder, it is perhaps more appropriate to regard his condition as an adaptation to prolonged incarceration in austere circumstances, as well as a number of attacks on him associated with prison life and
